

Appreciation of Our Inland Sea

It is not often that any community sees the production of a work like "Our Inland Sea, With the Story of a Homestead," which has come from the pen of Alfred Lambourne. When such a work is produced, it makes an epoch in local literature, and if I mistake not, it will ultimately find its place in the literature of the world. It is not that the work is voluminous or pretentious, but that it is possessed of the qualities of naturalness and artistic freshness that make for broad appreciation and lasting fame. I am convinced that Mr. Lambourne made no mistake when he preferred literature to painting for the expression of his appreciation and love of nature, and his artistic sense. It was my good fortune to read his work in manuscript, and it impressed me deeply. Here was a fortunate combination of circumstances. That Mr. Lambourne is well fitted by nature for the writing of such a book goes without saying. And the isolation of his position in this western country, and especially during his residence on Gunnison Island, where he was struggling homestead and his vineyard, was a great advantage in leading him to the deep reflections with which the book abounds. The subject matter and the manner of treatment fit in with the qualities of the man's mind, and the very difficulties and disappointments he encountered in his life work here, give to the work a deeper meaning and a greater value than would have been possible under other circumstances and if his enterprises had been successful. The solemnity and the strangeness and the beauty of the inland sea, especially in its western part, are admirably portrayed in the work. The writer's mood led him to depict the solitude and grandeur of the wonderful body of water, and by similitude and yet by contrast, the grandeur and solitude of the distant mountain tops, in a way which I am sure no other writer has approached. And this very mood has led him to express these things unconsciously—the best possible form of expression. There is no part of the work that is studied or labored. It abounds in artistic freshness and initiative. For fear that a wrong impression may arise, I will say that the work is not designed as a description of our inland sea, or a chronological and exact account of Mr. Lambourne's homesteading experience. On the contrary, it is a purely artistic production, with just enough of the personal history of the attempt to make a vineyard on a lonely island, and enough description of that part of the sea, to serve as a background for the writer's discursive reflections on various phases of life and its philosophy. There is absolutely nothing sordid or commercial in the work. Nor is there an attempt to describe the scenery of the inland sea and its shores and islands in a geographical way. The focus of the work is Gunnison Island, and it is the writer's fancy, rather than his descriptive or narrative ability, that ranges out from this place and embraces more than the sea, the valley, and the surrounding mountains. The philosophy of the work is universal; its art, while intensely local in its illustrative passages, is also universal. One regrets that in the public mind Alfred Lambourne has been regarded in the past more as an artist than a writer. I would say unhesitatingly that his literary ability is greater than his power as an artist. Indeed, in the particular field in which this work deals, his greatest of them all. His style is unlike any other local writer's, and as pleasing as it is unique. He is, I think, entitled to the distinction of being called a stylist—master of a form of writing, peculiarly his own and full of rare beauty of thought and expression. There is no exuberance or sickly sentiment, and no attempt unduly to embellish the book with rhapsodies of thought or description.
